"THE MOST EASTERN POINT IN SWITZERLAND."

The extreme point on the eastern side of Switzerland is the mountain peak known as Piz Chavalatsch. It does not rank among the highest summits although its height is 2765 meters but nevertheless it forms a dominating view point. Its wooded slopes begin in the Mustair (Münster) valley and its higher slopes are celebrated for their floral profusion. Its summit is easily accessible although it finishes by a sharp foursided pyramid.

Good roads lead up to it from the Italian side, one from Gloreza (formerly Glurns in the Tyrol) and the other from Stelvio by the pass of the same name).

From Mustair (the ancient little Romanche city with a convent founded in 780 by Charlemagne) one reaches the summit through cool and shady pine forest. The region appears wild and isolated but it must be remembered that the river Rombach flows out at Etsch on the other side of the Swiss frontier, so that the Mustair valley is situated beyond the group of the Alps. It would seem almost to form part of Italy, only its inhabitants have always had a great and unwavering attachment to Switzerland.

The rushing mountain torrents have excavated deep and wild gorges in the countryside but the soil and everything else washed down by them during past ages, has levelled out the valley.

The view from the summit is magnificent. It opens on one side on the shining dome of the Ortler and on the other is spread out the grey rocks and thick vegetation of the National Park. This region is one of the most beautiful and characteristic of the Grisons Alps so it is hardly surprising that it has so many fervent admirers.
