

Zeitschrift: Museum Helveticum : schweizerische Zeitschrift für klassische Altertumswissenschaft = Revue suisse pour l'étude de l'antiquité classique = Rivista svizzera di filologia classica

Herausgeber: Schweizerische Vereinigung für Altertumswissenschaft

Band: 73 (2016)

Heft: 1

Artikel: Three passages in Horace's Odes

Autor: Courtney, Edward

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-587270>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist die Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften auf E-Periodica. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Zeitschriften und ist nicht verantwortlich für deren Inhalte. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern beziehungsweise den externen Rechteinhabern. Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen sowie auf Social Media-Kanälen oder Webseiten ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Mehr erfahren

Conditions d'utilisation

L'ETH Library est le fournisseur des revues numérisées. Elle ne détient aucun droit d'auteur sur les revues et n'est pas responsable de leur contenu. En règle générale, les droits sont détenus par les éditeurs ou les détenteurs de droits externes. La reproduction d'images dans des publications imprimées ou en ligne ainsi que sur des canaux de médias sociaux ou des sites web n'est autorisée qu'avec l'accord préalable des détenteurs des droits. En savoir plus

Terms of use

The ETH Library is the provider of the digitised journals. It does not own any copyrights to the journals and is not responsible for their content. The rights usually lie with the publishers or the external rights holders. Publishing images in print and online publications, as well as on social media channels or websites, is only permitted with the prior consent of the rights holders. Find out more

Download PDF: 09.07.2025

ETH-Bibliothek Zürich, E-Periodica, <https://www.e-periodica.ch>

Three Passages in Horace's Odes

Edward Courtney, Charlottesville

Abstract: This paper argues that the problems in Horace, Odes 1.35.21–24 are to be solved by the alteration of nec ... ueste to sed ... mente, as proposed by previous scholars, and that in 2.13.2 primum and in 3.27.13 sis licet should be emended to prauam and sci-licet.

I.

1.35.21     Te Spes et albo rara Fides colit
              uelata panno, nec comitem abnegat
              utcumque mutata potentis
              ueste domos inimica linquis.

at uulgus infidum et meretrix retro
              periura cedit

These lines from Horace's ode to Fortuna present two main problems, which apparently have no connection whatsoever with each other:

(a) As Nisbet/Hubbard say, the antitheses between rara ("manifested by few") and uulgus, Fides and infidum are plain, and are stressed by at, a word which is not to be watered down to a mere connective as it is by e.g. Ker (1964, 43–44), reporting Housman in his lecture notes as holding the same opinion,<sup>1</sup> and R.G. Mayer in his commentary. This implies that whereas the uulgus runs away from houses which have fallen on misfortune, Spes and Fides remain there despite this misfortune. Nisbet/Hubbard aptly quote [Sen.] Herc. Oet. 601–3 (spoken by the chorus composed of friends of Deianira) fidus comites accipe fatis: / nam rara fides ubi iam melior / fortuna ruit and two passages from Ovid's Ex Ponto (to which Bentley adds a third, 2.3.10) praising friends for refusing to abandon their friend Ovid and become comites Fortunae when that goddess brings (?) misfortune. Many passages are quoted by Fraenkel in TLL s.v. fides 675.47 which criticise cases in which that quality is debased by following change of fortune, and praise the opposite; I quote only Lucan 8.485–6 laudata fides cum sustinet ... quos fortuna premit. In view of all this we cannot follow those

1     Ker quotes "Housman at Man. 3.112" as arguing for the change of at to sed in order to convey "a real antithesis". There is nothing about Horace at the indicated place (nor at 3.312 adduced below) nor could there be in Housman's commentary written in Latin, not English. I have not found any such comment anywhere in Housman's writings, and I cannot imagine what has happened here.

(e.g. Mayer) who think that Fides abandons great men who have fallen on hard times and goes off in the company of now hostile Fortuna, which is what the transmitted text says. It follows that we have to accept Peerlkamp's alteration of nec to sed in order to make Horace say that Spes and Fides do not accompany Fortuna in fleeing; thus the required contrast with retro cedit, to be added to the above-mentioned antitheses, is introduced. This emendation is accepted in Shackleton Bailey's text and argued in his Profile of Horace (91–92), where he refers to Housman's note on Manilius 3.312 for instances of the interchange of these two words in manuscripts. Housman quotes fourteen cases of this (including the passage of Manilius) in the commentary and addenda; of these two appear to be false references, one is based on a dubious reading, five have possible psychological as well as purely transcriptional causes (e.g. a neighbouring nec), but six are valid for comparison with this passage. To Housman's list one may add the scholiast on Juvenal 11.57 (see my article in BICS 14, 1967, 44).

(b) The phrase mutare uestem can be applied to acts of disguise and to a sociological change of apparel (e.g. Odes 1.36.9) and in a few other places to one-off situations plainly irrelevant here; otherwise it always is applied to going into mourning (OLD muto 4a, uestis 1b, TLL muto 1726.51); cf. Epode 9.27–8 terra marique uictus hostis punico / lugubre mutauit sagum. But if Fortuna is mourning her departure from powerful houses she cannot also be inimica to them; Kiessling/Heinze think that she can, swallowing what they themselves call “eine nicht ganz einwandfreie Mischung der Vorstellungen”. Shackleton Bailey's answer is to assert that the phrase here does for once imply not mourning but maleficence, though in Aesch. Eum. 370 adduced by him the Eumenides, though clothed in black, have not changed into it. Neither he nor Nisbet/Hubbard nor I can believe (though L. Mueller can) that the Latin permits us to understand that it is the powerful houses that go into mourning. It seems to follow that one of the contradictory terms must be corrupt. Which? Nisbet/Hubbard assume inimica, but this word seems to be quite appropriate; it is mutata ueste that is hard to interpret. Consequently an obscure 18th-century Dutch scholar, E. de Clerc van Jever,<sup>2</sup> altered ueste to mente. This may well be right; mutare mentem is found at e.g. Cic. Catil. 1.6, Manil. 4.257, and is the opposite of eadem mens (e.g. Nepos Hann. 2.5, Livy 8.31.3; Epist. 1.1.4 is different).<sup>3</sup> The passage will now mean “but they refuse to accompany you when you, your mind changed, abandon great houses”.

2 I had noticed this proposal many years ago, and the reference was recently checked for me by Professor R.G. Mayer in the midst of manifold calls on his attention. He is the “Ieuerus” of Housman's note on Lucan 1.481, but rates only a passing mention even in L. Mueller's Geschichte der klassischen philologie in den Niederlanden (Leipzig 1869) 100.

3 Also from long ago I have a penciled note that the same suggestion was made by Markland, but if this is correct I cannot now supply a reference.

II.

2.13.1–4     *ille et nefasto te posuit die,
quicumque, primum et sacrilega manu
produxit, arbos, in nepotum
perniciem opprobriumque pagi*

On this passage, which introduces the topic of the tree which almost fell on Horace, A.Y. Campbell sarcastically remarks “quotiens necesse sit arbor una eademque ponatur, dicant editors”. No editor has accepted the challenge. Kiessling/Heinze note “zum Ausdruck eines Beginnes das Pflanzen des Baumes schon der Anfang des Unheils war”, and Nisbet/Hubbard write a note listing passages which conform to the pattern adumbrated by Kiessling/Heinze, finally assuring us that “Once it is seen that Horace’s primum is wittily emphatic, its separation from posuit seems quite natural”, a sentence which conveys no clear meaning to me. The problem may be illustrated by a passage which superficially looks similar, Ovid RA 85–6 arbor ... / quo posita est primum tempore, uirga fuit, because Ovid goes on to contrast its former with its present state. Kiessling/Heinze have given the game away with their phrase “zum Ausdruck eines Beginnes”; primum is not the same as olim and always implies a following step, and there is none here. Campbell’s own conjecture is useless; instead I propose prauam, so that now the day was unlucky, the planter was criminal, and the tree itself was depraved.

III.

In Odes 3.27 Horace’s persona is bidding farewell to a woman called Galatea; “Horace” would clearly prefer that she should not go, but, though concerned about the dangers of her journey, wishes her well. He begins by stating the wish that the journeys of the wicked be accompanied by bad omens, but he himself will look for good omens for those on whose behalf he feels concern. So, Galatea, let us hope that you will live happily and mindful of me wherever you settle, and that there are no bad omens for your journey.

3.27.13–16     *sis licet felix ubicumque mauis
et memor nostri, Galatea, uiuas, teque nec laeuus uetet ire picus
nec uaga cornix.*

As the discussions in the Nisbet/Rudd commentary and by Nisbet (in his Collected Papers 267) indicate, the basic problem is that the phraseology of 13 would naturally mean “as far as I am concerned”, as if “Horace” did not really care. Shackleton Bailey (Profile 97) follows T.E. Page in punctuating licet as parenthetical, but this is not only jerky, as Nisbet says, but puts the word in the wrong place before felix; and what could be more unpoetical than Shackleton Bailey's translation "yes, it's all right"? Many editors follow Bentley in assuming that between 12 and 13 "Horace" has in fact taken the omens and found them favorable. It seems quite a stretch to read this into the text which says nothing about this essential step, and those who accept the idea have to follow Bentley in accepting the very weakly supported variant uetat in 15; only Gordon Williams among those who follow this interpretation can combine it with retention of the subjunctive, the function of which receives little illumination from his translation "may forbid" and paraphrase "no thought of ill omen need prevent her journey" (emphasis added).

It seems to me that a satisfactory solution would be to read scilicet. The sequence of thought would then be this: "I shall look for good omens for those on whose behalf I feel concern (7–12); the fact is (scilicet) that I hope that you will live happily and mindful of me". The implication would be that "Horace" regrets the departure of Galatea but has no hard feelings about it. Scilicet (see OLD s.v. 3a) would introduce a motive for the preceding statement, as at 1.37.29 we are told that Cleopatra committed suicide by the asp's bite, the reason being (scilicet) her refusal to be paraded in a triumph. sis felix is admittedly a common phrase, but the phrase uiuete felices is applied by Vergil (Aen. 3.493) to the parting farewell from friends, and is taken over by epigraphical poets to express the final farewell by the deceased (CLE 804, 1095.9, 1117.9). There is also Lygdamus 5.31 uiuete felices, memores et uiuete nostri. This is surely a reminiscence of Horace, and it reproduces the syntactical form of my conjecture, felix et memor nostri uiuas, as in the translation above.

Correspondence:

Edward Courtney

1500 W Pines Dr

Charlottesville, Virginia 22901

USA

edcourt2@cs.com

Bibliography

Bentley R., Horace, Opera (Cambridge 1711).

Campbell A.Y. (ed.), Carmina cum Epodis (Liverpool 1945).

Courtney E., "The transmission of Juvenal's text", BICS 14 (1967) 38–50.

De Clercq van Jever E., Selectarum observationum in M. Annaei Lucani Pharsaliam specimen alterum (Leiden 1772), part 1, p. 53.

Ker A., "Some passages from Horace", PCPhS 10 (1964) 42–47.

Kiessling A. & Heinze R., Oden und Epoden (Berlin 1930, 81955).

Mayer R.G. (ed.), Odes I (Cambridge/New York 2012).

- Mueller L., Oden und Epoden (St. Petersburg/Leipzig 1900).
- Nisbet R. & Hubbard M., A commentary on Horace: Odes, book I (Oxford 1970).
- Nisbet R. & Hubbard M., A commentary on Horace: Odes, book II (Oxford 1978).
- Nisbet R. & Rudd N., A commentary on Horace: Odes, book III (Oxford 2004).
- Nisbet R., Collected Papers on Latin Literature (Oxford 1995).
- Page T.E., Carminum Libri IV (London 1970).
- Peerlkamp P.H., Q. Horatii Flacci Carmina (Harlem 1834).
- Shackleton Bailey D.R., Profile of Horace (London 1982).
- Shackleton Bailey D.R., Horatius Flaccus, Quintus. Opera (Munich 2001).
- Williams G., The Third Book of Horace's Odes (Oxford 1969).