

Scripted and staged : designing fiction for the reality tv age

Autor(en): Ganz-Blaettler, Ursula

Objektyp: Article

Zeitschrift: Studies in Communication Sciences : journal of the Swiss Association of Communication and Media Research

Band (Jahr): 4 (2004)

Heft 1

PDF erstellt am: 27.05.2024

Persistenter Link: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-790958>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Inhalten der Zeitschriften. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern.

Die auf der Plattform e-periodica veröffentlichten Dokumente stehen für nicht-kommerzielle Zwecke in Lehre und Forschung sowie für die private Nutzung frei zur Verfügung. Einzelne Dateien oder Ausdrucke aus diesem Angebot können zusammen mit diesen Nutzungsbedingungen und den korrekten Herkunftsbezeichnungen weitergegeben werden.

Das Veröffentlichen von Bildern in Print- und Online-Publikationen ist nur mit vorheriger Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber erlaubt. Die systematische Speicherung von Teilen des elektronischen Angebots auf anderen Servern bedarf ebenfalls des schriftlichen Einverständnisses der Rechteinhaber.

Haftungsausschluss

Alle Angaben erfolgen ohne Gewähr für Vollständigkeit oder Richtigkeit. Es wird keine Haftung übernommen für Schäden durch die Verwendung von Informationen aus diesem Online-Angebot oder durch das Fehlen von Informationen. Dies gilt auch für Inhalte Dritter, die über dieses Angebot zugänglich sind.

URSULA GANZ-BLAETTLER*

SCRIPTED AND STAGED. DESIGNING FICTION FOR THE REALITY TV AGE

Guest Editor's Introduction

The term fiction, just as many other terms employed in mass communications as an academic field, can assume several meanings, depending on its specific use and context. This following thematic section of Studies in Communication Sciences intends to shed light on just two of these contexts:

There is, for once, fiction as a rather pragmatic and summary description of certain textual genres and formats which are considered part of media entertainment and therefore do, in fact, correspond to specific production principles and respective organizational structures.

And then there is fiction as an epistemological category, as some kind of rhetorical ideal type of speech, the respective typology based on the assumption that fictional texts (be they oral, written or audiovisual) have some qualities of narrativity in common, while some other traits set them apart from other established types of narrative speech - be these journalistic, or historical, or documentary modes of expression.

Conventional use of the terms implies that there is no necessary grounds in facticity nor some indispensable referring back to events that "actually" happened - and therefore no need for journalistic or scientific proof of the claims and propositions made. On the other hand the sheer idea of fictional speech (the term, again, encompassing its various manifestations in different media) does imply some rules as to how to designate - and recognize - fiction as such, how to gain and maintain credibility, and how to cue the receptive processes of sense-making as somewhat facultative and open-ended, with regards to the plot presented and the story, or stories, told.

*University of Lugano, ursula.ganz-blaettler@lu.unisi.ch

The following pages do focus on TV fiction, and more precisely on European TV fiction, as set apart from non-fiction TV and confronted - in an era and territory increasingly marked by what Umberto Eco anticipatory coined "neotelevisione"¹ - with what has lately become widely known (and largely discussed) as Reality TV.

In a first section of Full Papers some important statistical facts and overall observations are presented with regards to fiction as an undeniable, if contested, television reality in today's European Common Market. Jean-Pierre Candeloro and Giuseppe Richeri "did the counts" and, by way of retrieving and commenting recent data on behalf of the production and distribution of TV fiction, present a rather bleak picture of the encouraging measurements taken and the results obtained with regards to a stronger position of homegrown European fiction. Their paper is followed by some powerful and provocative suggestions by Milly Buonanno as to how to invite foreign fiction as a migratory, and cultural, force into this considerably well- (or over-?) protected realm which is the European TV fiction landscape. Finally, two National case studies are provided by Michele Sorice (on the history and current situation of Italian TV fiction) and Tanja Hackenbruch (the case of a Swiss fiction which obviously struggled with language barriers as well as cultural differences).

A second section then looks at (mostly TV) fiction as generic ideal type and rhetorical means of expression, with some introductory reflection on philosophical concepts of fiction versus lie / disclosure offered by Michele Amadò. His paper is followed by some tentative propositions as to how to differentiate mediated television fiction from - in fact, just as mediated - television non-fiction (Ursula Ganz-Blaettler). The sub-section closes on Martin Luginbuehl's analytical, and revealing historical look back at the beginnings of Swiss television and the emergence of news programs, which had yet to define, and convincingly (re-)construct, some kind of televisual authenticity.

No thematic section on selected aspects of European TV fiction would be complete without an actual outlook for the possible things to come. Three authors do open the debate on future formats and formulas, with Armando Fumagalli and Luca Manzi identifying, or proposing some general trends in the development of Italian television fiction and Gerd Hal-lenberger staking out some innovative, and definitely fruitbearing claims in the field of media analysis as textual and generic analysis.

¹ See Umberto Eco (1983). TV. La trasparenza perduta. In: ECO, U. Sette anni di desiderio. Cronache 1977-1983, Milan: Bompiani, 163-179.

My thanks, as guest editor and contributor to this thematic section of the Studies in Communication Sciences, go to Andrea Rocci and Eddo Rigotti for the editorial care and rigidity applied, to many anonymous reviewers, to Alessandra Filippi (for the patient correcting, re-correcting, and re-re-correcting of endless drafts and bozze), and, finally, to Francesco Casetti for opening the following sequence of papers with such a powerful and erudite voice of knowledge.

While some experts of mediated fiction do insist that Shakespeare was serious when he wrote All's Well That Ends Well, claiming that only such narratives can be considered good which come to some neat and well-ex-pected closure, I tend to support the opposite claim whereas good stories need to open well in order to catch the listener's or viewer's interest and curiosity. Which goes for Casetti's preface, but - hopefully - also for the rest of this, and for many unexpected, innovative television fictions and Reality shows to come.

