It is well-known that traffic passing through the Gothard Tunnel between Goeschenen (northern side) and Airolo (southern side) is heavy. The Federal Railways transported in both directions 8,525 two to eight-seater cars in 1938, 22,838 in 1948, 30,965 in 1950, 46,115 in 1951, 46,250 in 1952, 44,198 in 1953 and 41,000 so far this year. The number of cars passing from Airolo to Goeschenen on Easter Monday alone this year exceeded 2,000. Normally about forty cars can be transported in a hour in each direction on a train consisting of flat wagons, that is to say a total of 480 cars in twelve hours. At peak periods such as bank holidays, etc., extra wagons can be added to enable a train to carry 65 cars and it is possible to put on a second train so as to transport 130 cars in the hour, giving a total of eighteen trains and 1,170 cars in twelve hours.

Large scale alterations are in progress at Airolo station with a view to making a special track for trains carrying motor vehicles and platforms to enable the rapid loading and unloading of cars without holding up the regular traffic. Similar alterations are envisaged for Goeschenen. Once these alterations have been made and the Gothard tunnel has been subdivided into four signalling sections (there are two at the present moment) it will be possible to run each hour, in both directions, two to three trains each carrying 68 cars (136 to 203 vehicles in all) which makes, in twelve hours, 25 to 32 trains and a total of 1,700 to 2,176 cars.
