Letter from London

The Golden Years

Fabrics have become a romance in themselves, the beautifully woven Swiss textiles with their superb finish a legend in the great fashion cities of the world. The gleam of gold for after six has never been more fashionable, while the most beautiful bride of the sixties era will probably go down as the golden girl in the golden gown created by designer-fashion-romanticist John Cavanagh for his currently showing Autumn-Winter 65 collection—an enchantingly slim sheath of deceptive simplicity in Abraham's ivory and gold lamé, topped with a tiny turban of the same material, from which flows a pale golden illusion of ethereal tulle. This, possibly the most beautiful bridal creation seen at any of the great International collections, is nevertheless challenged for the golden stakes by Royal favourite Norman Hartnell with his luxurious gold mesh net gown scattered with tiny pearls and encrusted at neck and cuffs of a wide dolman sleeve.

The verdict on the autumnal fashion shows presented by the ten members of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers, is that it is a vintage season, with everyone in the mood, young in heart, gay, challenging and exciting. This is the success season of the longer leaner jacket and Michael had a great success with his beautifully cut jackets, low-belted but high-shaped at front with double rows of buttons, the back swinging from a twenty-odd inch centre vent. Sometimes his jackets dipped at the back, while sleeves were sharply inset and shoulders wider; his range of colours took in the gingerbrowns by day in tweeds, while for sheer drama he gave us black and white, with orange for impact. Hartnell's collection proves that high society is still in evidence, with his couture collection stressing the beautiful formal gowns, the passion for horse racing for which he indulges his clients with superb tweeds, big plaids and warm rich fur linings, but he swims with the need for lower prices in his second couture collection: a special series of useful chic ensembles which require one fitting only before they are delivered one week from the date of order. His Petit Salon, as usual, is stocked for the autumn with vivid rain defying suits and elegant little cocktail and dinner dresses. Brown is an elegant and smart colour. Hems are up at most of the top houses, and it's smart to wear black.

One charming gown at Mattli was of beautiful St-Gall lace in a series of the prettiest little dresses in London; lace is seen everywhere. With the surge of gambling casinos in London, and the appeal of a glittering night life, the designers have sent out a wonderful choice; Patersons fine wool dress embroidered at hem, neck and sleeves, is a charming example while Hardy Amies plays it cool with a delicious white satin shirtmaker of great class.

Michael was marvellous as always with his sure impact of black and white in a swirling cocoon of a fox fur coat; stripes are well in vogue and Clive uses them to advantage with his vivid Bedouin striped one shoulder gown, draped in arab fashion over the head to fall into a drapé when removed, after braving the weather outdoors.

Cavanagh with his clientele of duchesses, royals and debutantes was at his best with an enchantingly feminine show and his use of purple proved a winner, with rose-pink, green and red well on target.

Edward Rayne, the Chairman of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers, had this to say when he opened the Autumn-Winter shows: "In a sense all fashion is change and all fashion is extravagant and all change is extravagant, but in a sense all twentieth century life reflects this and that is what we are all working for". He continued: "I know that the couture is passing through change but we know it's a rarefied world.

We cater directly for those who understand and recognize the best; it is a matter of standards".

A matter of standards and who understands it better than the great craftsmen and textile kings of Switzerland who contribute so greatly every season to the wealth of beauty and class which, a matter of perfection, sets the standard.

Challenges will come—and indeed do—from the young designers of the ready-to-wear market; but it is the "top ten" of British fashion who, in their fashion, decree the "look"—the class—and the prestige by which Britain competes with the best.
