A new look emerges from the London spring/summer 1978 collections for late day and evening wear, this being the area where Swiss textiles can mainly be found. Clothes are more romantic, prettier, softer and more feminine than last year's. Lines are fluid in soft silk jersey or luxuriously full with enormous yardages used for frilled chiffon or crêpe de Chine skirts. Each designer does his or her own thing, for "so many lines are right", said designer Janice Wainwright explaining her theme for spring where she has used Abraham's jersey which she likes "because it does not drop". She produced a whole range of different styles in this material from spiral to tent shapes, all decorated with embroidery. And embroidery is right for it reflects the current romantic mood in fashion.

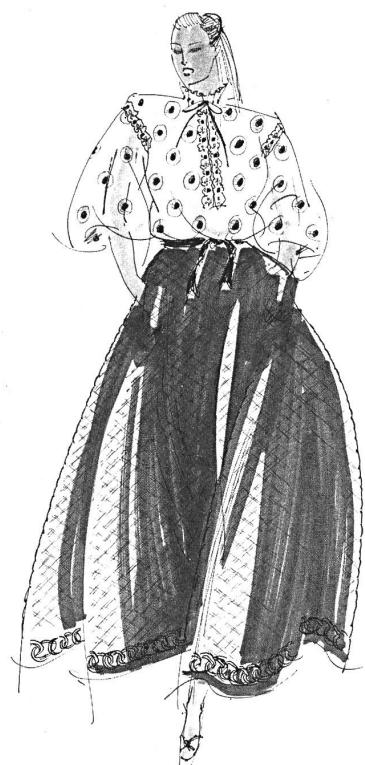

Prices in the top bracket are no longer a problem and so designers have used the most exquisite embroideries they could find in Switzerland. Some say that "for psychological reasons" they no longer look at the price when choosing an obviously very expensive embroidery which they cannot resist. But when made into a stunning dress it will certainly sell for there is a market for beautiful, highly priced clothes in Britain at the present time. Thus the dream Murray Arbeid had many years ago of making very expensive dresses has now come true. The big story for spring 1978 is embroidery on tulle. Best examples came from Swiss manufacturers Forster Willi, Schlaepfer, Union and Naeff, and were seen in the collection of Anna Beltrao, Salvador, Murray Arbeid, Michael Geary and

Marcel Fenez, to mention just a few. Forster Willi's embroidered collars on tulle are popular and they look prettiest in white used on pastel-coloured crêpe de Chine dresses. In what is her largest ever collection, Anna Beltrao shows a dozen different ways of using Swiss embroideries on delightful evening dresses. Even the traditional lily of the valley embroidery motif is no longer confined to a wedding dress but receives here a versatile evening gown treatment. Anna Beltrao also loves Abraham crêpe de Chine and created some cleverly cut dresses in this material which appear to be held together merely by knots. Swiss prints are few and far between in the London spring collections with the exception of some striking florals on crêpe de Chine and on cotton satin from Abraham, on cotton jersey from Mettler, as seen at Dorville by Michael Geary and on voile from Fischbacher used by designer John Bates for Jean Varon. Swiss rustic voile, the upgraded version of cheesecloth, reappeared at Anne Gough, enhanced with her favourite sweet pea embroidery, in a group of day dresses. From Marcel Fenez comes what designer

SPRING/SUMMER 1978

Roland Klein calls "a younger look", which is reflected in Swiss embroidered, very full, frilled and infinitely pretty ankle-length tent dresses. This gifted French designer who came to England 10 years ago and has worked for the last 7 years as joint managing director of Marcel Fenez, epitomised the romantic look with crinoline style dresses. Typical is one in champagne coloured embroidered tulle with taffeta underskirt and another in white broderie anglaise with matching parasol which will no doubt find its way to Ascot next spring.

For a touch of glitter, Schlaepfer's crystals and sequins in attractive and eye-catching new combinations with embroidery appear mainly in evening wear collections.

However, Cojana, the house most famous for their coats, have used a deep border embroidery from Schlaepfer in beige and brown with gold appliqué on pure silk for a group of tailored coordinated day into evening outfits. Cojana also shows weather coats in Swiss ciré and mat polyester/cotton qualities from Hausammann in their collection for spring/summer 1978.
