Serial houses at Hanover-Kirchrode (pages 106-108)

The architects built these houses for themselves and a friend one year ago. They found a site between orchards, 35 metres wide and 100 metres long, commanding a distant view and inclining to the south.

The difference in level due to the incline of the site was turned to account. The living-room, kitchen and bathroom are sites some 50 cm below terrain; the entrance and bedrooms - owing to the rising ground - so much higher that their windows with suitable aprons stand above the roof of the lower rooms. Thus the whole house with all its rooms faces south. Each house is somewhat out of line in relation to its neighbour so that outside sitting areas receiving sunlight from the west are created.

Filling station at Wiesbaden (pages 109-111)

This design consists of two petrol pumps with a covering roof and the building proper. The whole lay-out is characterized by the precision of its details. The building is divisible into one-storey section (3 stands for servicing cars together with oil room, the height of the room being 4 metres) and a two-storey section, each storey being 2.5 metres in height. In the latter block the attendant's and customers' rooms are sited on the ground floor with a terrace, dressers, WCs and office, while the transformer room, machine room, staff room and WC with shower, heating chamber and coal store are accommodated in the basement. The building is a steel structure and is heated by means of radiation panels in the ceiling.

This filling station, which is the property of the firm of Opel-Fahr, stands not only at the intersection of five roads and the driveway to a large workshop but also in a verdant zone along the Fulda. The circular shape is particularly suitable for the traffic, which approaches from every side. The ferro-concrete roof is supported by six tubular steel stanchions of 133 mm diameter. The building is provided with a cellar.
