I. *Heroides*¹

4.85f. (Phaedra to Hippolytus)

*tu modo duritiam siluis depone iugosis:
non sum materia digna perire tua.*

If materia is sound, it must mean indoles, ‘character’, ‘disposition’, carrying on duritiam (‘harshness’) in the previous line; this is certainly the sense which is required (‘I do not deserve to die because of your character’). Whether materia can have this sense has been justly doubted, all the more so because materia can so easily be confused with what would be the mot juste in the context, viz. natura; for this confusion cf. Quint. Inst. 7.1.20, Plin. Nat. 7.65, Sen. Nat. 2.52.1.

9.41f. (Deianira to Hercules)

aucupor infelix incertae murmura famae, speque timor dubia spesque timore cadit.

Dubia was apparently first queried by W. Camps, ClRev 4 (1954) 206: “Deianira’s husband Hercules is away, and she is anxious both about his safety and about his fidelity. She listens eagerly, she says, to catch each breath of rumour, though it keeps changing, and alternately fear gives place to hope in her heart, and then hope again to fear. To the expression of this idea the epithet dubia, attached to spe, does not contribute anything”; he proceeds to propose dubiae, dative referring to Deianira. Another idea was suggested by J. B. Hall in ICS 15 (1990) 276: “If hope is wavering, it will not bring down fear ...; fear will only be brought down by hope if fear is wavering. ... Logic will be restored if dubius is written for dubia.” I do not believe that any form of dubius is appropriate: dubia is a simple corruption of subi<t>*a*²; the changes of rumour are reflected in her rapid changes of mood (with timore supply subito). For the confusion of initial s and d cf. Sen., Herc. O. 536 datum/satum; Benef. 4.12.1

1 The following modern editions are referred to: A. Palmer (Oxford 1898); G. Showerman, revised by G. P. Goold (Loeb edition, London 1977). – I am very grateful to Professor E. J. Kenney for commenting on an earlier version of the notes in Section I.

2 So too at Met. 14.508 dubiarum is (as Heinsius realized) a corruption of subitarum; cf. Tac., Agr. 18.4 subitis / dubiis.

dicimus/scimus; Dial. 11.7.2 somnos/domos; other instances are given in Housman's note on Manil. 1.355 (dign-/sign-); see also my note on 21.157ff. below (deque/saepe).

9.105ff. (Deianira to Hercules)

*i nunc, tolle animos et fortia gesta recense:
quod tu non esses iure uir illa fuit;
qua tanto minor es quanto te, maxime rerum,
quam quos uicisti uincere maius erat.*

Deianira reproaches Hercules with having been conquered by Omphale.

In 106 the first hand of P wrote quem, which is certainly a mistake, presumably for the vulgate quod; but with quod the subjunctive esses is unintelligible. It remains unintelligible if one reads quo, as do Palmer (who calls the subjunctive 'descriptive', whatever that may be) and Showerman/Goold, who translate 'she has proved herself a man by a right you could not urge'. But that sense (at least if one substitutes 'cannot urge' for 'could not urge') is good, and would be elucidated by the following couplet: Hercules is as much inferior to Omphale as it was a greater achievement to vanquish Hercules than to vanquish those whom Hercules vanquished. All that is necessary is to change the impossible esses to ipse es. "Esse and ipse are so often interchanged that I have ceased to note examples", says Housman (Classical Papers 649), who proceeds to note more than a score, including Her. 20.50 and 124. Elision at this point in the pentameter is not allowed (Housman ib. 1119), but for the prodelision of es Platnauer, Latin Elegiac Verse (Cambridge 1951) 87, n. 1, cites Prop. 3.23.12.

11.45f. (Canace to Macareus)

iam nouiens erat orta soror pulcherrima Phoebi, nonaque Luciferos luna mouebat equos.

The time comes for Canace to give birth.

The context demands not 'a ninth' but 'a tenth' moon; hence the vulgate correction of nonaque (P) to denaque. But denaque is impossible because, as Housman in his note on Manil. 4.451 explained, dena luna would mean not 'a tenth moon' but 'ten moons'. Housman tentatively emended nonaque to et noua; this is approved of by G. P. Goold (Gnomon 46, 1974, 478), who (in order to rule out Bentley's conjecture pronaque by establishing the exact sense of mouebat equos) adduces Met. 14.228 proxima post nonam cum sese Aurora mouebat. That passage suggests proxima as a possible emendation in ours; if it were corrupted, as it very frequently is (see Housman's note on Manil. 5.218), to prima, then nonaque might have been due to a deliberate attempt to correct both sense and metre.

13.153f., 157f. (Laodamia to Protesilaus)

*illi blanditias, illi tibi debita uerba dicimus, amplexus accipit illa meos. ...
hanc specto, teneoque sinu pro coniuge uero,
et, tamquam possit uerba referre, queror.*

Laodamia has a waxen image of her absent husband to remind her of him.

Queror comes as a surprise after the caresses and embraces of 153f.; should it be loquor? The two words are variants at 14.91 and at Met. 1.637, 14.280, Martial 3.80.1; see also my note on Met. 9.303f. below. The process of corruption is well illustrated by Cic., Verr. 5.40 loqueretur>queretur>quereretur.

15.5ff. (Sappho to Phaon)

*forsitan et quare mea sint alterna requiras carmina, cum lyricis sim magis apta modis.
flendus amor meus est: elegi quoque flebile carmen;
non facit ad lacrimas barbitos ulla meas.*

Sappho's reason for writing in elegiac, instead of her usual lyric, verse.

The paradosis is elegi, and this should certainly be retained (not altered to some form of elegia) because elegi is the only word which the elegists themselves use for elegiac verses (for them Elegia is always the personification of the genre). But quoque is meaningless; as Baehrens saw, it is an intrusion designed to repair the metre after the loss of sunt before flebile. This stopgap quoque is much commoner than is sometimes realized; see my note on Met. 6.26f. below.

16.213f. (Paris to Helen)

*quid tamen hoc refert si te tenet ortus ab illis?
cogitur huic domui Iuppiter esse socer.*

Paris has just contrasted his own glorious ancestors with those of Menelaus, scandalous figures like Atreus, Pelops, Tantalus. But what does this freedom from scandal matter to him if Menelaus is still Helen's husband? On the credit side Menelaus can claim Jupiter as his father-in-law.

Cogitur is quite devoid of meaning and not easy to replace. Perhaps creditur.

17.79f. (Helen to Paris)

et modo suspiras, modo pocula proxima nobis sumis, quaque bibi, tu quoque parte bibis.

Pocula proxima nobis is apparently always taken as 'the cup nearest me'.

But there was only one cup, and Paris drinks from it immediately after (proxima for proximus) Helen. This is clear from Amor. 1.4.31f. quae tu reddideris ego primus pocula sumam, / et, qua tu biberis, hac ego parte bibam. Even Bentley must have misunderstood, because instead of nobis he wanted nostris, which is impossible on the correct interpretation of the passage.

19.11f. (Hero to Leander)

aut fora uos retinent aut unctae dona palaestrae, flectitis aut freno colla sequacis equi.

Hero lists male occupations from which she is excluded.

Dona palaestrae, ‘the gifts of the wrestling-school’, is a totally unconvincing phrase, justifiably queried by Heinsius. For dona I suggest dura, ‘hard toils’; for this neuter plural see ThLL V 1. 2307.19ff. At Sil. 3.597 I believe that donabit is a corruption of durabit.

19.71f. (Hero to Leander)

est mare, confiteor, nondum tractabile nanti, nocte sed hesterna lenior aura fuit.

Nondum has aroused suspicion for two reasons: (a) in P it is written over an erasure, (b) the pentameter would lead us to expect a reference not to the future but to the past. Hence Bentley proposed non nunc, which has been adopted by Showerman/Goold. Equally possible, and perhaps preferable, would be non iam.

19.115f. (Hero to Leander)

o utinam uenias, aut ut uentusue paterue causaque sit certe femina nulla morae.

The latest discussion of this couplet is that of E. Courtney in SOSlo 64 (1989) 126; in order to eliminate ut in the sense of utinam he proposes to replace it with heu. Perhaps a second o would be preferable.

20.13f. (Acontius to Cydippe)

nunc quoque idem timeo, sed idem tamen acrius illud adsumpsit uires auctaque flamma mora est.

This couplet also has been discussed by Courtney (l.c.): “timeo makes no sense; there must once have stood there a verb meaning ‘desire’, and accordingly Bentley suggests cupio, Palmer studeo – neither plausibly, but both better than Housman with his $\langle auemus \rangle$ idem [timeo]”. Courtney himself adds uoueo. I think that tento or tempto would be preferable. Acontius is still trying to get Cydippe to promise to marry him, as he was when he threw the apple towards her; cf. 7 coniugium pactamque fidem ... posco and 33f. Much the same corruption, of tenet to timet, has probably occurred at Met. 2.691 and 3.642; the opposite corruption, of tim- to ten-, has occurred at Fast. 5.46 and at Stat., Silu. 5.2.74.

20.53f. (Acontius to Cydippe)

*aut esses formosa minus, peterere modeste:
audaces facie cogimur esse tua.*

Aut is rejected on good grounds by S. J. Heyworth (Mnemosyne 37, 1984, 105ff.), who proposes to replace aut esses with esses si or esses sed or sin esses; none of these has any special attraction. I suggest nata esses (cf. Amor. 2.14.19 nasci formosa); au for na is a very easy slip, especially when the preceding line begins with ut and the following one with aud-.

21.19f. (Cydippe to Acontius)

*ante fores sedet haec, quid agamque rogantibus intus,
ut possim tuto scribere, 'dormit' ait.*

This is the traditional punctuation. In ClQu 43 (1993) 261 P. A. M. Thompson proposes to punctuate:

*quid agamque rogantibus (intus
ut possim tuto scribere) 'dormit' ait.*

The correct punctuation, I think, is

*quid agamque rogantibus 'intus',
ut possim tuto scribere, 'dormit' ait.*

For Ovidian hyperbata see Housman, Classical Papers 140, 415ff.

21.157ff. (Cydippe to Acontius)

*ter mihi iam ueniens positas Hymenaeus ad aras fugit et a thalami limine terga dedit, uixque manu pigra totiens infusa resurgunt lumina, uix moto concutit igne faces;
saepe coronatis stillant unguenta capillis
et trahitur multo splendida palla croco.*

158 a (cf. Fast. 6.481) Ehwald: e π 160 concutit Burman: corripit π

Cydippe's wedding has thrice been postponed because of her illness.

In 161 saepe has justifiably been suspected because it does not go at all well with stillant and because it appears to clash with ter (157). It is easy to emend it to deque (stillare de occurs at Met. 1.112 and 2.364); for the confusion of initial d and s see my note on 9.41f. above.

21.165ff. (Cydippe to Acontius)

*proicit ipse sua deductas fronte coronas, spissaque de nitidis tergit amoma comis;
et pudet in tristi laetum consurgere turba.*

Because of the gloom caused by Cydippe's illness Hymenaeus realizes that his presence is inappropriate.

It is impossible to attach any clear meaning to consurgere, 'rise', and Burman's consistere, 'hold his ground', is not a great improvement. I suggest <os> ostendere; the confusion of d and g is not uncommon, and an unfortunate recollection of resurgunt in 159 may have played a part in the corruption.

21.193ff. (Cydippe to Acontius)

*iam quoque nescioquid de te sensisse uidetur;
nam lacrimae causa saepe latente cadunt,
et minus audacter blanditur et oscula rara †accipit† et timido me uocat ore suam.*

Cydippe describes to Acontius his rival's half-hearted wooing of her.

Since the context demands not 'receives' but 'gives' few kisses, accipit must be wrong. The available conjectures are admouet, appetit, applicat, arripit; these are reviewed (and another one, eripit, added) by P. A. M. Thompson (l.c. 263f.). I suggest that the true emendation is occupat, 'appropriates to himself'; cf. Stat., Ach. 1.575 (of Achilles kissing Deidamia) occupat ora canentis.

21.203ff. (Cydippe to Acontius)

*ei mihi, quod gaudes et me iuuat ista uoluptas!
ei mihi, quod sensus sum tibi fassa meos!
205 †at mihi lingua foret† tu nostra iustius ira,
qui mihi tendebas retia, dignus eras.*

In 203 me (for te) is the conjecture of P. A. M. Thompson (l.c. 265), which enables us to retain ista uoluptas instead of altering it to illa uoluntas or illa simultas (cf. E. J. Kenney, ClQu 29, 1979, 421).

As handed down, these four lines begin si mihi, si mihi, at mihi, qui mihi. In 203 and 204 mihi is certain (as is Gronovius's correction of si to ei); mihi is also certain in 206, but in 205 it may well be the result of assimilation to the other three. Most attempts at emending 205 (and there have been many) have taken the form of importing a conditional clause; the easiest way of doing so is to write nisi (\acute{n}) for mihi (\acute{m}). I therefore suggest at nisi lenta forem (forem is due to Gronovius), comparing 17.249f. tu fore tam iusta lentum Menelaum in ira / ... putas? For lentus used of ira itself see 3.22 and ThLL VII 2.1164.54.

21.227f. (Cydippe to Acontius)

*sed tamen aspiceres uellem, uelut ipse rogabas:
et discas sponsae languida membra tuae.*

uelut Francius: prout π

For the corrupt et discas either Bentley's aspicias or Ehwald's adspiceres is worthy of consideration. A more pointed sense, I suggest, would be obtained from des⟨pi⟩cias, which would carry on the theme of 221–226 ('if you saw me now, you would not want to marry me'). For the loss of medial pi (et being a consequential insertion to repair the metre) cf. Quint., Decl. mai., 13.11 (p. 277.6 H.), where the loss of pi has reduced dispicite to discite.

II. Amores

3.7.55f. †sed, puto, non blanda† non optima perdidit in me oscula, non omni sollicitauit ope?

At least half-a-dozen attempts have been made to heal the first half of the hexameter; none has won much favour. It seems most probable that the couplet consists of three short questions, each introduced by non. In that case parenthetic puto, which cannot stand in a question, must be eliminated; in my view it has been intruded because of an unfortunate recollection of line 2 at, puto, non uotis saepe petita meis! (which likewise cannot be a question, although it has often been taken as such). To fill the gap we require a main verb parallel to perdidit and sollicitauit; I suggest sed non blanda ⟨luit⟩?

A clear instance of puto inserted to repair the loss of another word in the line will be found at Met. 15.497; see my note on Met. 6.26f. below.

III. Ars Amatoria

3.269 pallida purpureis tangat sua corpora uirgis.

A pale girl should offset her pallor by wearing clothes with bright purple stripes.

Modern editors generally retain the paradosis tangat, although it is not obviously the most appropriate word for the sense which is required. The alternative spargat is better (it could have lost its initial s by haplography after purpureus), but I suggest that the mot juste is pingat, the corruption being due to the very common p/t interchange.

3.287f. *est quae peruerso distorqueat ora cachinno;
cum risu laeta est altera, flere putes.*

Risu laeta, 'joyful in her laughter', is not a very convincing phrase, and the various substitutes for laeta listed by the editors are palaeographically hardly credible. Much more credible would be in risu tota est; this use of totus is found at Fast. 6.251 in prece totus eram and at Met. 6.586 (= 13.546) poenaeque in imagine tota est.

3.725f. ecce, redit Cephalus siluis, Cyllenia proles, oraque fontana feruida pulsata aqua.

The pentameter is taken to mean that he dashed spring water over his glowing cheeks. My suspicion of pulsata is increased by the occurrence of pulsantur in 722; I would read mulsit, and take the meaning to be that he assuaged his thirst; ora mulcere = ora leuare, as at Rem. 230 arida nec sitiens ora leuabis aqua.

3.761ff. aptius est deceatque magis potare puellas (cum Veneris puero non male, Bacche, facis), dummodo qua patiens caput est, animusque pedesque constant, nec quae sunt singula bina uides.

Drinking can be more becoming for girls than eating, but only within due limits.

In the text given above I have put 762 in parenthesis so as to link 763f. with 761. I have also introduced two conjectures:

- (a) In 763 dummodo for hoc quoque, which is quite unintelligible. For the interchange of modo and quoque see Housman, Classical Papers 514 (and add Met. 1.361). The corruption of dum to hoc is not inconceivable; initial d and h are confused at Sen., Ben. 7.19.2 (habeat/debeat), Epp. 90.18 (durum/horum). Dummodo without a verb expressed occurs at Amor. 1.6.47 and 2.16.20; Fast. 5.242.
- (b) In 764 uides for uide. The effects of drunkenness are then conveyed, as they should be, in three parallel clauses (the -que after animus is connective, not prospective).

IV. *Metamorphoses*³

2.482f. neue preces animos et uerba precantia flectant, posse loqui eripitur.

³ The following modern editions are referred to: H. Magnus (Berlin 1914); F. Bömer, 7 vols. (Heidelberg 1969–1986); F. J. Miller, revised by G. P. Goold (Loeb edition, London 1984).

Juno robs Callisto of the power of speech, so that she should not be able to appeal to Jupiter for help.

To eliminate ‘the disgusting tautology’ of preces followed by uerba precantia, D. R. Shackleton Bailey (Phoenix 35, 1981, 332) would change precantia to querentia; other conjectures are potentia and rogantia. However, uerba precantia occurs three times elsewhere in the Metamorphoses (each time in this metrical position), and three times in other works of Ovid; so it may be preces that is at fault (due to erroneous anticipation of precantia). One might think of querela, adducing 486 adsiduoque suos gemitu testata dolores.

2.562ff. *pro quo mihi gratia talis
redditur, ut dicar tutela pulsa Mineruae et ponar post noctis auem.*

The crow complains of being supplanted by the owl as a protégée of Minerva.

Dicar is interpreted either as ‘I hear people say’, which is ridiculous in the context, or as ‘I am sentenced’ (by Minerva), which is a strange use of dicere not supported by Trist. 3.14.9 est fuga dicta mihi. Perhaps it should be laedar (dicar being an erroneous expansion of dar, after the loss of le); laedere is a word of which Ovid is exceptionally fond.

Alternatively, uincar, ‘defeated by the owl’; for the enmity between the two birds see Bömer’s note. Initial u and d are confused at Sen., Phoen. 297 (diris/uiris) and Med. 718 (dirus/uirus); Sil. 9.600 (ductor/uictor).

2.576f. *fugio densumque relinquo
litus et in molli nequiquam lassor harena.*

Bömer notes that elsewhere the reflexive use of lassor is confined to the perfect stem. Should we read luctor? Both verbs are Ovidian.

3.592ff. *mox ego, ne scopulis haererem semper in isdem, addidici regimen dextra moderante carinae
flectere et Oleniae sidus pluuiiale Capellae Taygetenque Hyadasque oculis Arctonque notau uentorumque domos et portus puppibus aptos.*

Acoetes learns the art of navigation.

For notau I should read notare, parallel to flectere.

6.26f. *Pallas anum simulat falsosque in tempora canos
addit et infirmos baculo quoque sustinet artus.*

Baculo quoque has been justly suspected; among conjectures are baculo quos and baculum quod. I think that quoque is an insertion to fill the gap left by the loss of a small word before sustinet; perhaps (as Professor Delz has suggested to me) male, a word of which, in its various senses, Ovid is extremely fond (its omission could be explained by the similarity of the endings of baculo and male).

This stopgap quoque is found elsewhere in the poem (see also my note on Her. 15.5ff. above):

12.369 fraxineam misit contentis uiribus hastam,

where contentis uiribus is due to Heinsius. The paradosis is mentis quoque uiribus, which has usually been adopted, incredible though it is. After the loss of the con-symbol the gap was filled with quoque and tentis was changed to mentis.

12.545 ille quidem maiora fide (di!) gessit.

Here di likewise is due to Heinsius. In most manuscripts it has been lost after fide and replaced with quoque.

15.364 i quoque, delectos mactatos obrue tauros.

Here too quoque may be a space-filler, but there is no agreed solution of the problems posed by the tradition. It is also possible that quoque is a mistake for modo (see my note on Ars 761ff. above).

15.497ff. fando aliquem Hippolytum uestras si contigit aures
 / ... / occubuisse neci.

Here si is a minor variant; the paradosis is quoque, inserted to fill the gap left by the absorption of si in uestras (so J. P. Postgate, Journ. Philol. 22, 1894, 146). A rival stopgap, found in a few manuscripts, is puto (see my note on Amor. 3.7.55f. above), which has been wrongly adopted by some editors.

Another instance is Trist. 1.2.63f. si quam commerui poenam me pendere uultis, / culpa mea est ipso iudice morte minor. Here commerui (Heinsius' conjecture) lost its first three letters after quam, and the loss was repaired by the insertion of quoque (si quoque quam merui is the paradosis).

6.537ff. omnia turbasti: paelex ego facta sororis,
 tu geminus coniunx, hostis mihi debita poena.
 quin animam hanc, ne quod facinus tibi, perfide, restet, eripis?

Philomela addresses Tereus.

In the latter half of 538 most editors accept the paradosis, but it yields no satisfactory sense. Bömer records 8 attempts to emend it; each of the four words has been altered to something else, most often poena to Procne. I think that the trouble lies in hostis, which I would replace not with non haec (so some dett.) but with mors est, which gives an excellent connection with what follows.

6.581f. euoluit uestes saeui matrona tyranni fortunaequae suae carmen miserabile legit.

Procne reads the message woven by Philomela.

Both fortunaequae and carmen were emended long ago (in some dett.) to germana and fatum respectively; these emendations were again made by Housman (in Postgate's Corpus Poetarum Latinorum), and are adopted by Miller/Goold. A question remains about the origin of carmen; I suggest that it is a misguided attempt to make a word out of german, a marginal note intended to correct fortunaequae to germana.

7.574ff. *corpora deuoluunt in humum fugiuntque penates quisque suos, sua cuique domus funesta uidetur, et, quia causa latet, locus est in crimine paruus.
semianimes errare uiis, dum stare ualebant,
adspiceres, flentes alios terraque iacentes.*

The plague of Aegina.

The latest discussion of this passage is that of R. J. Tarrant (ClPh 77, 1982, 358), who is inclined to excise 576. "If there is any hope for 576", he says "it lies in ending a sentence with crimine (locus est in crimine = 'the place gets the blame') and starting a new one with the last word in the line. Among modern editors only Goold takes this step, adopting Korn's partim, impossible for Ovid (he uses partim only in pairs and never of persons). Heinsius' notis is neater and is based on a manuscript variant (notus); if 576 is to be retained, this is the way to do it." I find it difficult to accept notis (with uiis) because the emphasis which the word derives from its position seems misplaced. Korn's partim, on the other hand, supplies a subject for the infinitive errare which balances alios in 578; the same function would be fulfilled by Sedlmayer's multos or (and I suggest that this is the best solution) by paucos (only a few can stand on their feet); paruus and paucus are variants at Pont. 3.1.60 and at Mart. 7.49.1.

With this reading I should accept the line as genuine: locus est in crimine reminds one of Hor., Epp. 1.14.12f. *uterque locum immeritum causatur inique:
/ in causa est animus.*

9.37f. *et modo ceruicem, modo crura micantia captat
aut captare putes, omnique a parte lacessit.*

The river Achelous tells of his struggle with Hercules.

D. R. Shackleton Bailey (Phoenix 35, 1981, 333), objecting to the various senses which have been given to micantia, would replace it with modo ilia. Perhaps we should rather look for another epithet of crura, e.g. madentia, an attribute of a river being applied to the personified Achelous; so at Sidon.,

Carm. 2.335ff. the personified Tiber has a chin which drips with water and a belly which is wet (madidam aluum), ib. 22.46 the personified Ganges has bracchia roscida, and ib. 7.26 the Nymphs are umentes.

9.303f. moturaque duros
uerba queror silices.

All editors retain uerba queror, an unexampled use of the verb (Bömer finds a parallel in Prop. 1.5.17 only by misconstruing that passage). The variant loquor should be adopted; for the confusion of the two see my note on Her. 13.158 above.

9.507f. at non Aeolidae thalamos timuere sororum.
unde sed hos noui? cur haec exempla parauit?

Byblis quotes the children of Aeolus as a precedent for incest.

There is no obvious point in Byblis asking herself about the source of her own knowledge of the Aeolidae. I suggest that unde means 'from what motive', almost a synonym of cur, and that in place of noui we want moui, 'brought up', 'brought into the discussion', a meaning of mouere for which OLD (sense 18) adduces Pont. 2.2.56. For the moui/noui variation cf. Fast. 2.490 and 6.760.

10.224ff. ante fores horum stabat Iouis Hospitis ara †inlugubris sceleris†, quam si quis sanguine tinctam aduena uidisset, mactatos crederet illic lactantes uitulos Amathusiacasque bidentes:
hospes erat caesus!

An altar of Jupiter in Cyprus which the Cerastae polluted with the blood of a guest.

For the corrupt passage in 225 Magnus lists, in addition to manuscript variations, 15 modern conjectures. I add another, nomine 'Lugubris'; similar phrases, in the same metrical position, are 1.317 nomine Parnasos, 3.156 nomine Gargaphie, 5.386 nomine Pergus, 11.295 nomine Daedalion. One is reminded of the saxum at Eleusis which Cecropidae nunc quoque 'Triste' uocant (Fast. 4.504). It is quite possible that in derives from a contraction of nomine, but the origin of sceleris (celeri M) remains obscure; perhaps celebris, 'famous', part of a marginal note.

11.67ff. non inpune tamen scelus hoc sinit esse Lyaeus
amissoque dolens sacrorum uate suorum
protinus in siluis matres Edonidas omnes 70 quae uidere nefas, torta radice ligauit;
quippe pedum digitos, in quantum est quaeque secuta,
traxit et in solidam detrusit acumina terram.

Bacchus changes to oak-trees the Thracian women who had chased Orpheus to his death.

I think it probable that uidere in 70 should be emended either to fecere (a manuscript variant), or to iuuere (Capoferreus).

In quantum “nemodum explicauit”, says Housman (on Manil. 3.249), thereby (I presume) abjuring his own earlier conjecture (in Postgate’s Corpus Poetarum Latinorum) uia quam tum. I suggest that quantum may conceal q<uis> uatem, ‘the feet with which each pursued Orpheus’ (in being a metrical insertion); about a dozen instances of quis in Ovid are listed by Neue-Wagener, Formenlehre 2.469.

11.369f. qui quamquam saeuit pariter rabieque fameque, acrior est rabie.

The subject is a ravening wolf.

Although Bömer’s quotations amply illustrate the use of acer ‘de bestiis’, I think that rabie is probably an erroneous repetition from the preceding line and would read rabie<s>; cf. Plin., Nat. 7.5, Sil. 11.516 (furor).

11.482ff. *“ardua iam dudum demittite cornua” rector clamat “et antemnis totum subnectite uelum”.
hic iubet; inpediunt aduersae iussa procellae.*

Should hic be sic?

13.600ff. *Iuppiter adnuerat, cum Memnonis arduus alto
corrui igne rogos, nigrique uolumina fumi infecere diem, ueluti cum flumina natas exhalant nebulas, nec sol admittitur infra.*

To replace the meaningless natas a large number of adjectives have been proposed: gratas, latas, lentas, nigras, opacas, uastas. A different approach may be suggested, flumina in auras; cf. Sil. 12.137 Stygios exhalat in aera flatus.

13.956f. hactenus acta tibi possum memoranda referre, hactenus haec memini, nec mens mea cetera sensit.

I should punctuate referre, / hactenus; haec memini. Just as hactenus in 957 repeats hactenus in 956, so haec repeats the hac element of hactenus.

14.383ff. *“non inpune feres, neque” ait “reddere Canenti, laesaque quid faciat, quid amans, quid femina, disces
rebus” ait, “sed amans et laesa et femina Circe!”*

Circe to Picus, who has scorned her in favour of his beloved Canens.

The repetition of ait is unparalleled, as is pointed out by E. J. Kenney, ClRev 38 (1988) 248. To eliminate it Postgate proposed rebus; at est et amans, where et is very convincing but at much less so. I suggest rebus: adest et amans; for the menacing tone of adest see OLD sense 15 and Verg., Aen. 4.386 (of Dido's ghost) omnibus umbra locis adero.

14.426f. ultimus aspexit Thybris luctuque uiaque fessam et iam longa ponentem corpora ripa.

The nymph Canens lies down to rest on the bank of the Tiber.

Nowhere else is longus applied to a river-bank, and its meaning is obscure. I wonder if iam longa conceals <g>raminea.

14.488ff. *nam dum peiora timentur, est locus in uoto; sors autem ubi pessima rerum,
sub pedibus timor est securaque summa malorum.*

Prayer is in place only where it is feared that still worse may befall.

Est locus in uoto must be corrupt because it can only mean 'a place is prayed for'. Yet Bömer convincingly defends both est locus and some case of uotum; most probably uoto is dative. In that case in must be wrong, but it is not clear what should replace it; perhaps est, the repetition possibly conveying the suggestion 'there is, I admit'.

14.656ff. *adsimulauit anum cultosque intrauit in hortos pomaque mirata est "tanto"que "potentior!" inquit, paucaque laudatae dedit oscula, qualia numquam
uera dedisset anus.*

Vertumnus in the guise of an old woman woos Pomona.

The idiomatic use of tanto with a comparative is well established (see Bömer's note), but potentior must be the wrong comparative. Miller/Goold translate 'you are far more beautiful'; where does potens mean 'beautiful'? Yet that is the sort of sense which is required: a compliment to the lady which will lead up to the kissing in the next line. Petitior (Capoferreus), 'more desirable', is on the right lines, but more convincing, I suggest, would be p<l>acentior (cf. Hor., Carm. 2.14.21 placens uxor), even though this comparative is apparently not found elsewhere (Ovid uses placitus instead at Ars 1.37 and Her. 20.37).

15.477f. *perdite siqua nocent, uerum haec quoque perdite tantum:
ora uacent epulis alimentaque mitia carpant.*

Pythagoras forbids the eating of animal flesh. "Was this to abstain from feasting? Not at all. It was to abstain from feasting on forbidden meats; 75 dapibus temerare nefandis / corpora: not a word against other feasts; 81 prodiga diuitias alimentaque mitia tellus / suggerit atque epulas sine caede et sanguine praebet. It is these feasts, the feasts of blood, that are forbidden.” So J. P. Postgate, Journ. Philol. 22 (1894) 152, who therefore proposes ora <cruore> uacent, which has been adopted by Miller/Goold. I suggest ora uacent illis (the animals mentioned in the previous line), epulis having originated in an explanatory note.

15.838f. nec nisi cum senior similes aequauerit annos aetherias sedes cognataque sidera tanget.

Jupiter prophesies long life for Augustus.

“Neither similes nor aequauerit has any sense, for there is nothing in the context to which the years of Augustus’ life can either be likened or equalled”, says Housman (Classical Papers 932). Among many attempts to emend the line, the most favoured idea has been that of Heinsius, that there is an allusion to the longevity of Nestor: adducing Pont. 2.8.41 in Pylios ... annos and Trist. 5.5.62 aequarint Pylios cum tua fata dies, he proposed senior Pylios. To this Housman objects (a) that senior is redundant (“if a man is to die as old as Nestor ..., what need to tell us that he will then be well stricken in years?”), (b) that Pylios for similes is a violent alteration. Perhaps the violence of the alteration is irrelevant: it may be no coincidence that senior is an almost perfect anagram of Nestor; and perhaps senior similes has its origin in a gloss “Nestori similis” (or “similes”). If so, another word, in addition to Pylios, has been ousted; felix is one of many possibilities.

V. *Fasti*⁴

3.229f. *inde diem quae prima meas celebrare Kalendas
Oebaliae matres non leue munus habent.*

Mars explains the origin of the Matronalia, celebrated on 1 March.

Line 229 has not been satisfactorily elucidated. The fullest discussion is that of Bailey; he points out that any reading which makes Mars say that 1 March is the first Kalends of the year is not admissible, since Ovid’s treatment of this point was concluded at line 150; like some other modern editors (e.g. Bömer, Schilling), he adopts Rappold’s conjecture inde diem, quae prima mea est, celebrare Kalendas. This is a very easy change, but the information that the first day of the month is the Kalends seems more likely to derive from an explanatory note than from Ovid. I would obelize Kalendas in the belief that it has supplanted another word; perhaps quotannis, which is used by Ovid at 4 The best edition is that of E. H. Alton, D. E. W. Wormell, and E. Courtney (Teubner edition, Leipzig 1978). Other modern editions referred to are those of C. Bailey (Book 3, Oxford 1921), F. Bömer (Heidelberg 1957/58), and R. Schilling (Budé edition, Paris 1992/93).

5.629, likewise of an annual celebration. For glosses in the Fasti see Alton/Wormell/Courtney, Praef. p. XII and critical note on 4.47.

3.303f. ad solitos ueniunt siluestria numina fontes et releuant multo pectora sicca mero.

I think that pectora should be guttura; for guttur used in drinking contexts see 6.138 and the other Ovidian passages listed in ThLL VI. 2375.22–27. At Juv. 1.156 guttur has been corrupted to pectore in some manuscripts, and in general such words of dactylic form were liable to be interchanged; see Housman on Manil. 1.416, R. G. M. Nisbet in BICS Suppl. 51 (1988) 107, and Alton/Wormell/Courtney on Fast. 2.29 and 33.

3.765f. cur anus hoc faciat quaeris? uinosior aetas †haec erat et† grauidae munera uitis amat.

Why do old women sell honey-cakes in honour of Bacchus?

At the end of the pentameter the manuscripts vary between amat and amans; the former should be accepted, because the latter should not (a point made by E. Courtney, ClQu 23, 1973, 146). At the beginning of the line erat is still retained by conservative editors (Bömer, Schilling), but the tense is wrong; a present tense, parallel to amat, is demanded by the sense. Hence most editors read est (a minor variant), but this solution is too facile; deeper corruption has, I think rightly, been suspected by Alton. I suggest uinosior aetas / natura, et grauidae (or, perhaps better, natura est: grauidae). For aetas = senecta cf. Medic. 45; Met. 12.448; and OLD sense 4b; uinosior natura is paralleled by Her. 20.25 natura callidus. Initial h and n are easily confused (e.g. haec/nec, hu(n)c/nunc), and it is possible that haec may have seemed necessary to someone who misunderstood aetas.

3.843f. *an quia perdomitis ad nos captiua Faliscis
uenit? et hoc signo littera prisca docet.*

Does Minerva Capta derive her name from the capture of Falerii?

The manuscripts are divided between signo and ipsum, of which the former seems the better indication of the truth. I suggest uenit, ut in signo (the cult-statue in the shrine); in the usual reading (given above) both et and the bare ablative are awkward. I assume that in dropped out after ut (for the confusion of these two see Housman's note on Manil. 4.608), and that hoc is a space-filler.

Similarly at 4.778 dic ter et in uiuo perlue rore manus, when in dropped out after et and before ui-, the metre was repaired by changing ter to quater, which is not consistent with what we know of ancient ritual.

4.625ff. luce secutura tutos pete, nauita, portus:
uentus ab occasu grandine mixtus erit.
scilicet ut fuerit, tamen hac Mutinensia Caesar 628 grandine militia perculit arma sua.

In 628 grandine cannot mean 'im Hagelsturm' (Bömer), not can it go with hac ('sous pareille grêle', Schilling); with hac one must supply luce (cf. 622 and 623). I believe that grandine is an erroneous gloss on hac which has supplanted another word, now irrecoverable; the most obvious possibility is an epithet of Caesar, e.g. felix or uictor.

5.479ff. Romulus obsequitur, lucemque Remuria dicit
illam qua positis iusta feruntur auis.
aspera mutata est in lenem tempore longo littera quae toto nomine prima fuit.

The Lemuria, a festival in honour of the dead, was originally called Remuria in honour of Remus.

Toto is ignored by the translators; not surprisingly, because it conveys nothing. Prisco would give good sense (cf. Met. 14.850f. priscum ... nomen / mutat), but is palaeographically remote. Closer would be ficto, 'the named which Romulus had coined'; for this sense of ingere see ThLL VI. 774.14ff., and for the confusion of f and t cf. Met. 7.741 fictus/tectus; Prop. 4.7.15 furta/tecta; Sen., Herc. f. 697 ferax/tenax, id. Phaed. 379 ferebant/tenebant.

VI. Tristia

3.14.13ff. Palladis exemplo de me sine matre creata
carmina sunt; stirps haec progeniesque mea est.
hanc tibi commendo, quae quo magis orba parente est,
hoc tibi tutori sarcina maior erit.
tres mihi sunt nati contagia nostra secuti:
altera fac curae sit tibi turba palam.

Ovid entrusts his offspring, i.e. his literary works, to the protection of a friend. The three which are to be treated differently from the rest are the three books of the Ars.

In Euphrosyne 16 (1988) 134 J. B. Hall rightly queries whether contagia nostra secuti can mean 'have caught pollution from me'. This sense of secuti is incredible, as is the idea that the poet himself is somehow contagious. I think that both contagia and secuti are corrupt, and would read nati, conuicia nostra, tegendi. His books 'bring reproach' upon him; Ovid uses conuicia in this sense, and in apposition to another noun, at Met. 5.676 aere pendebant, nemorum conuicia, picae; both ui and ta consist of three minims, and the c/g confusion is one of the commonest. Tegendi provides the required contrast to palam in the next line; for the ‘hiding away’ of Ovid’s works see Trist. 1.1.111 tres procul obscura latitantes parte uidebis and Pont. 1.1.4.

4.5.31ff. *sic iuuenis similisque tibi sit natus, et illum moribus agnoscat quilibet esse tuum;
sic faciat socerum taeda te nata iugali,
nec tardum iuueni det tibi nomen aui.*

Ovid’s good wishes for the son and daughter of a loyal friend.

“The position of iuuenis and the presence of -que discountenance translations like ‘dein jugendlicher Sohn soll dir ähnlich sein’”, says D. R. Shackleton Bailey (ClRev 32, 1982, 394), who therefore takes iuuenis as a predicate co-ordinate with similis; Ovid then prays that the son, presumably still a child, will grow to manhood. This is, I believe, the right construction (i.e. -que is not co-ordinate with the following et), but I desiderate an adjective other than iuuenis, which may well be an erroneous anticipation of iuueni in 34. I suggest felix.

It is possible that the et before illum should be ut.

5.1.23ff. *quod superest, numeros ad publica carmina flexi, et memores iussi nominis esse sui.
si tamen ex uobis aliquis tam multa requiret
unde dolenda canam, multa dolenda tuli.*

23 numeros Ehwald: animos uel socios codd. 24 sui uel mei codd.

Ovid has changed his use of the elegiac metre from themes of love to themes of lamentation. In doing so, he has reverted to what the ancients believed was its original use; cf. Hor. Ars 75f. uersibus impariter iunctis querimonia primum / ... inclusa est. In ‘ordering’ the metre ‘to be mindful of its name’, he is thinking of the traditional derivation of ἔλεγος from εὖ λέγειν or ἔ ἔ λέγειν used of the lament for the dead. So far as I can discover, only Bentley saw the drift of the passage; he proposed to change publica (to which no one has given a satisfactory meaning) to tristia. This fits the context admirably, but is palaeographically remote. Closer would be propria, ‘proper’, ‘appropriate’ (i.e. original); both proprius and publicus are words which were regularly abbreviated. I do not think that this suggestion is ruled out by the occurrence of propriis just below (28). (Professor Delz has pointed out to me that Ovid elsewhere does not lengthen the first syllable of proprius, and has suggested pristina instead.)
