RENAISSANCE AND REVOLUTION MAN: REFLECTIONS ON THE OCCASION OF BEAT SCHMID'S RETIREMENT

In May of 2008, professor Beat Schmid gave his farewell speech at the University of St. Gallen on the new form of information. In this speech of grand proportions, Beat Schmid attempted no less than to grasp the Internet era in all its might, yet focusing on the ways it has changed how we view and treat information today. In doing so, he combined - in his unique manner - insights from the classics (such as Aristotle) with cutting edge research results and his own revolutionary perspectives.

After a long and prestigious career, he is thus now resigning from the institute that he has founded more than ten years ago: the institute for media and communications management at the University of St. Gallen. During this time, Beat Schmid has been instrumental in establishing communications management as an important enterprise in the European university scene, both in teaching and in research. In this endeavor, he has played the same role of pioneer as in his early involvement and influence in e-commerce, having founded the oldest university e-commerce competence center and academic journal on the topic (Electronic Markets). A particular point of interest in the area of communications management has been his vision to combine technological perspectives and more social, community-oriented issues. This dual focus is best understood through his rich conception of media as interaction spaces for communities. Besides his many other contributions, Beat Schmid has also founded one of the few international journals on Media Management, the JMM. At the University of St. Gallen, he has not only founded the aforementioned =mcm*institute*, but also - prior to that - the Institute of Information Management. He has been active in different Swiss and international associations and also held important institutional positions within the University of St. Gallen. Beat Schmid's research interests span the areas of electronic markets, computational management theory, knowledge and business media, communications management and design theory. A key concept in many of his writings on these topics is what he refers to as "Implementation II" or the need to not only create products and services in the physical realm, but also in the minds of consumers. One of the key roles of communications management is consequently to help consumers understand product and service innovations.

Knowing all too well that Beat Schmid will remain an active and important member of several research communities for many years to come, we wish him many fruitful projects, studies and encounters. May he continue his role as Renaissance man, reminding us of the insights of the past, and revolutionary, seeing things clearly that most of us cannot yet grasp.

DGPuK CONFERENCE REPORT

Report on the Conference:
 “Identität und Vielfalt der Kommunikationswissenschaft”
DGPuK Annual Conference, University of Lugano, 30 April to 2 May 2008

In 1992 the German Communication Association (that is, the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Publizistik- und Kommunikationsgeschichte DGPuK) held its annual conference at the University of Fribourg, in a joint collaboration with its Swiss counterpart, the Swiss Association for Communication and Media Research (SGKM). The conference brought the subject of media entertainment as a social phenomenon and (trans-)disciplinary challenge on the map and in the limelight of communication studies. The next Swiss rendez-vous of the DGPuK took place much more recently – over the weekend of April 30th to May 2nd 2008 – and brought more than 200 DGPuK members together at the shore of Lake Lugano in order to discuss matters of disciplinary identity and diversity. The main questions evolved around the perspectives, the approaches and methods that map out and define contemporary communication studies in an era of rapid change. How well prepared are communication sciences that face the integration of divergent perspectives on media systems and convergence processes, but also the integration of transnational processes of globalisation, an increasing theoretical pluralism and, last but not least, the need for a constant revision of one’s own disciplinary profile and outlook?

The invitation for a critical, self-observatory look at contemporary practices and (pre-)occupations, both with regards to media convergence processes and to processes encouraging transition and renewal within the discipline, was met with overwhelming response. A rigorous peer-reviewing process was put into place to decide which papers and presentations were finally accepted; for the program and the abstract book of the conference see www.dgpuk2008.ch. The conference itself was held in a lively atmosphere of respectful debate and discussion, with the multilingual staff of the inviting Institute of Communication and Health (Prof. Peter Schulz) a much-appreciated, competent yet discrete presence. The three invited guest speakers Elihu Katz, Sonia Livingstone and Otfried Jarren provided a precious framework of historical contextualisation on their respective topics of effects research, audience conception and media regulation, while valuable quality time was successfully left open to networking and socializing processes – and to ventures, of course, that allowed to take in the breathtaking backdrop of the gorgeous location in a more relaxed setting and fashion.
