The first railway to be constructed on Swiss soil, that from Zurich to Baden, a distance of 14½ miles, was opened on August 9th, 1847.

In commemoration, both of this event, and of subsequent railway development in Switzerland, various celebrations have been taking place during the present year. These reached their Culmination on August 9th, the hundredth anniversary of the opening.

On Friday (August 8th), a large number of representatives of foreign railways administrations, specially invited for this occasion, were the guests of the Municipality of Zurich. Dr. Luchinger, the Mayor of the town of Zurich, extended a hearty welcome to the delegates and in his address paid a tribute to the late Alfred Escher of Zurich, who, when a Member of Parliament, sponsored and was responsible for the passing of the Bill to bring the principal railway companies in Switzerland under the administration of the state.

The next day (August 9th) on the centenary, Dr. W. Meile, President of the Management of the Swiss Federal Railways, during the official celebration ceremony at the "Kongresshaus" in Zurich, gave an interesting and concise exposé of the history of Swiss Railways during the last hundred years.

Federal-Councillor Celio, Chief of the Federal Post and Railway Department, in his speech congratulated the Swiss people on the sacrifices they had made at one time to bring their railway net under State control, an undertaking, although much opposed at the beginning, has since proved to have been a wise undertaking.

In the afternoon the official guests arrived at Baden, where they witnessed a procession depicting the first journey of what was then called the "Spanischbrötlibahn." Amongst the spectators were Federal-Councillor Celio, General Guisan, late Federal Councillor Pilet-Golaz, members of the General-Management of the Swiss Federal Railways and high Federal and Cantonal officials.

At the conclusion of the festivities in Baden, the original train, which was boarded by the official guests, left amidst the cheers of the population, and to the thunder of guns, and the music of bands playing on its triumphant journey to Zurich, being greeted at each station by large crowds of cheering spectators; on its arrival in Zurich the participants were received by the Mayor of the town of Zurich.

Dealing briefly with the history of the development of the railways in Switzerland it may be mentioned that after the inauguration of the Zürich-Baden line no other railway was opened for more than seven years. In 1850, however, Robert Stephenson submitted plans for the construction of 400 miles of lines. These comprised an east-to-west trunk route from Lindau to Geneva which followed the main river valleys. The scheme was eventually carried out with some modifications, the Cantons having been given powers in 1852 to grant concessions for that purpose. One consequence of this policy was that development tended to be local rather than national. Amalgamations, however, took place as early as 1853 and continued until about 1890, when five large "area" companies were in existence. During this period a nationally-owned railway was built from Zofingen to Constance via Winterthur, but was absorbed by the North-Eastern private system after only a few years of troubled financial existence. In 1887, the Federal Council took the first steps towards the purchase of all the Swiss railways by the State, and after lengthy negotiations, this was finally sanctioned in 1898. Some 760 route miles of line were taken over on January 1st, 1902, and between then and May, 1903, 770 further route miles were acquired. The Gotthard railway, with a route mileage of 170, was purchased in 1909, since when only 85 route miles have been added. A large mileage of secondary lines has, however, been left in private ownership, as has the important Berner-Alpenbahn and the 245-mile long metre-gauge Rhaetian Railway. At the present time, the total railway route mileage amounted to 3,625, of which 1,822 miles belong to the Federal Railways.

The most notable feature of the Swiss Railways is the extent to which electric traction is used. This is shown by the fact that of the 1,822 route miles owned by the Federal Railways 1,700 miles are operated electrically, and that 97.6 per cent. of the 10,107 million ton-kilometres worked in 1945 were worked by electric traction. The first line to be operated electrically was that between Brigue and Iselle, which was opened in 1906 and used the three-phase system. As a result of successful experiments on the Seebach-Wettingen line, the single-phase system was, however, adopted as standard and the Spiez-Frutingen section of the Lötschberg line was equipped on this system in 1910. The electrification of the Gotthard line, which had been decided upon in 1913, was delayed by the war, but was subsequently undertaken as part of a national scheme of conversion in which lines embodying steep gradients were dealt with first. The first stage of this scheme was completed in 1930. It is hoped that conversion will be finished next year.

Another notable feature is that there are 15 purely rack railways in the country and 13 on which steep sections are operated in that way. Although a number of these are used for tourist purposes only, the majority carry general traffic. All but two employ electric traction.

On the occasion of the 1st of August, Monsieur Flückiger, Swiss Minister in Moscow, wearing the uniform of a colonel of division, received members of the Swiss Colony, and also representatives of the Russian Foreign Office at the Legation.

Visas between Norway and Switzerland have been abolished since the 15th of this month.

All Switzerland's war-time controls — except those on coal and soap — will be lifted shortly.

The Governor of the National Bank of Egypt is going to Berne to discuss the question of converting Egyptian pound balances into Swiss francs.

Madame Bechara el Khoury, the wife of the President of the Lybian Republic, has arrived in Switzerland on a short holiday. The Federal Council has entertained her to dinner at the "v. Wattenwyl Haus" in Berne.

Traffic

Even before the war, the traffic over the Gotthard line had necessitated block sections in the 10-mile length of the double-track Gotthard Tunnel. Since fully-automatic signalling was considered too expensive at the time, the solution adopted in 1938 was to have a mid-tunnel block post controlled remotely from the signal box at Göschenen, at the northern end of the tunnel. The tunnel signals were connected with Göschenen by a 50-line cable.

Further expansion of traffic during and after the war has made it increasingly difficult to maintain the tracks and over-head wires during intervals between trains, so that frequent night possessions and single-line working have been required. In order to avoid single-line working over the whole section, crossovers were installed in mid-tunnel.

The mid-tunnel signalling, though still controlled remotely from Göschenen, now provides home and starting signals for both directions. The starters are over half a mile from the crossovers, so that between crossover and signal there is standing room for a complete train enabling a train to vacate a single-line section without having to wait until the preceding train has cleared the tunnel. The starting signals return automatically to "off" when the tunnel section ahead has been cleared. Home signals are controlled by a king lever, at Göschenen, which permits automatic operation during normal double-line working.

Single-line working in the southern half of the tunnel depends on the consent of the signalman at Airolo, by means of electric interlocking with Göschenen. Provision has been made, also, for emergency operation of the mid-tunnel points and signals from a small signal box on the spot.
