From August 21st to 29th a number of Swissair pilots, wireless operators and navigators, together with officers of the Navigation and other departments and representatives of the Swiss Air Ministry, the Radio Suisse S.A. and the chief of the Geneva Aeronautical Meteorological Observatory carried out a so-called survey flight to the American continent with a view to preparing Swissair crews for subsequent flights on the North Atlantic route. The various flying routes were covered by landing approaches being made to as many as possible of the various detour airfields; training in range flying, astro-navigation and radio-telephony was carried out and the various meteorological services were studied. The flight was made in the Douglas DC-4 machine HB-ILO.

The route followed led from Geneva to Shannon (Eire), Prestwick (Scotland), Reykjavik (Iceland), Goose Bay (Labrador), Stephenville (Newfoundland), Moncton (Canada), Washington (U.S.A.), Boston (U.S.A.), Halifax (New Scotland), Sidney (New Scotland), Gander (Newfoundland), Iagens Azores, Santa Maria (Azores) and back to Geneva. On the Reykjavik-Goose Bay lap the southernmost point of Greenland was flown over for observation purposes.

The distance covered on the flight to Washington was 5,531 miles, which distance was flown in an effective flying time of 28 hours 25 minutes. The return flight, over a distance of 4,794 miles, occupied 22 hours 32 minutes. The total distance covered in this practice flight was 10,325 miles and the total flying time 51 hours 7 minutes. In judging the mean cruising speed of 186 miles per hour it should be borne in mind that, for training purposes, several landing approaches were made at various airfields. Of the 10,325 miles flown, approximately 6,850 were over the open sea. The longest stretch was the last, from the Azores direct to Geneva, a distance of 1,812 miles which was flown in 8 hours 26 minutes.

In command of the flight was Captain Franz Zimmermann, Navigational Chief of Swissair. Acting under his orders were Captains Otto Heitmanek and Anton von Tscharner, radio operators Werner Wegman and Paul Auberson and the American navigator Robert E. Pittis, with three junior Swissair pilots, who are at present taking an air navigators' course at Geneva under Pittis' direction.

The general opinion of the Swissair Air Captains was that this flight was, even for the experienced

Dr. R. Jezler, of the Federal Justice and Police Dept. in Berne, speaking on the question of Dual Nationality, was of the opinion that Dual Nationality should not be abolished without weighty reasons, but that the right of depriving Swiss of their nationality in certain cases should be considered.

Federal Chancellor, Dr. Leimgruber, referred to the proposal of the London Swiss Delegation, that Swiss nationals abroad should be able to secure representation in the Swiss Parliament; in his exposé he said that according to the present constitution no such representation was possible, but that it was well worth to study the question with a view of altering the respective constitutional laws.

The question of military tax was also discussed, and it is hoped that the London Delegates will fully report on the result of these deliberations.

The "Auslandschweizerstag" was concluded on Sunday the 7th at the War Memorial at Murten, on which occasion speeches were made by Dr. H. P. Zschokke, President of the "Auslandschweizerwerkes" of the N.S.H., Mr. A. F. Suter (London), and Federal-Councillor Kobelt.
