Swiss exports of capital since the end of the war reached about 1,900 million Swiss francs, i.e., about 300 million Swiss francs per annum, according to a statement by Dr. W. Schwegler, a director of the Swiss National Bank. A part of these credits was repaid in the course of last year. Of the total amount of 1,900 million Swiss francs 800 millions were Government credits, 250 million foreign loans, and about 800 million credits and advances granted by banks.

Swiss Federal Railways lost about £3,320,000 in 1949 compared with a profit of about £1, 250,000 in 1948. An official report attributes this development to increasing competition from other means of transport, especially by road. The report further says that decreasing goods traffic is due mainly to growing competition from lorries. In 1949 the railways carried 16,000,000 tons of goods, or 2,500,000 tons less than in 1948. The deficit for 1949 was only the second in the last 11 years. Swissair had an operating loss of about £420,000, and what the company describes as a "particularly unfavourable outlook" for 1950 has led the company to ask the Government for financial help. Cuts in operations, plans and personnel have already come into force.

A £5 million trade treaty was signed by Switzerland and Sweden.

Swiss exports, with the exception of cheese, scrap, hides and skins, embroidery machinery and machinery for the watch and clock industry no longer require official export permits. Exporters, however, must still obtain the consent of the Quota Administration. Export fees have also been abolished by the Federal Government.

An assembly plant for British and American cars has just been officially opened at Schinznach (Ct. Aargau). The plant will assemble Chrysler, Plymouth, as well as the smaller De Soto and Dodge models, and the English Standard "Vanguard." In addition, the works will produce a new Swiss light motor-cycle the "Ami."

The factory will be operated by Auto-Montage Schinznach A.G. The present output of the works is three to four automobiles per day, but it is intended to increase production considerably within a short time. It is thought that the works will process 750,000 francs' worth of Swiss material annually.

The Swiss Government has abolished price control on a number of foodstuffs including chocolate, sausages and frozen meat. The prices of cinema tickets, hospital treatment, motor-car repairs, photographic developing and printing and imported leather have also been freed.

In a recent public discussion held in Berne in connection with the planned upward revision of Swiss tariff rates, a representative of the trade section of the Swiss Ministry of Economics declared that the Swiss Government was examining the question of a temporary revision of existing rates.

Hitherto, Swiss authorities had been reluctant to act or even to comment on demands made by leading representatives of Swiss private firms for an immediate temporary upward revision of Swiss tariff rates, since the promised introduction of a new permanent tariff list had been so long delayed.

Swiss interests rates have continued to decline in the course of the last few months. Statistics compiled by the Swiss National Bank reveal that interest rates for cash bonds of 12 State banks declined on the average from 2.65 per cent. at the end of January to 2.60 per cent. at the end of April and those charged by large banks from 2.50 to 2.28 per cent. During the same period average interest rates for savings deposits declined from 2.33 to 2.31 per cent. The average interest rate for first mortgages paid by 12 State banks was 3.54 per cent. at the end of April as compared with 3.56 per cent. at the end of January, 1950.

Switzerland intends to introduce television in the near future and proposes a standard of 625 lines and 25 frames/sec. The first stage in the development of a Swiss directional network was the establishment of a telephony link between Zurich and Geneva with relay stations on the Uetliberg and the Chasseral. The relay station on the Chasseral has been enlarged in the course of the past year and its own power plant has been installed. It is expected to play a big part in international telephony traffic. The Chasseral is mentioned as one of the high-altitude stations, together with the Dole, the Santis, Pilatus and San Salvatore, for eventual use in television transmission. In view of the mountainous nature of the country in some localities, relay stations will be used near the larger towns, e.g., on the Uetliberg for Zurich and the Gurten for Berne. It can be assumed that in the eventual television network a relay station will be required on the average every 100 km. The repeater installation and aeriels would cost in each case about 50,000 Sw. fr.

These plans are only provisional and further experiments will be necessary before a final plan for the Swiss television network can be evolved.
