Travel

In the last century, to travel meant to go a distance of ten miles from one's village. To the man of to-day, to travel would mean crossing thousands of miles in a few hours by plane, or in a few days by train. This possibility is, for the time being, reduced to a mere illusion, and the idea of travel must abandon the idea of great voyages or have recourse to his imagination alone. For, even if the space of four narrow walls, the taste for travel would still live on.

The very idea of travel must be reduced to the space of four narrow walls, the taste for travel, so firmly implanted in the heart of man and woman, is an expression of the eternal urge to new beginnings and self-renewal. Who more likely to yield to this invitation than woman and the creators of fashion?

The dressmaker's art whirls to the rhythm of the four seasons and lives out its flurrying life on society's turning stage. And woman, eternally unsatisfied, lives the pageantry of travel in the change of her apparel.
