The Heights

The Swiss Fashion Club in Arosa January 15th, 1964

This year the Swiss Fashion Club invited some forty fashion writers and reporters representing the trade press, illustrated magazines and several newspapers from eleven countries to the heights above Arosa for a fashion show, at an altitude of over 6,000 feet. At this showing the heights of success too were reached, thanks to the extremely high standard of the collection and the perfect organization of the whole occasion.

From theory...

Readers will remember that the aim of the Swiss Fashion Club is to set and launch a Swiss inspired sports and leisure fashion influencing similar fashions throughout the world and having Arosa for its centre. This result is to be obtained by cooperation between some twenty leading Swiss firms, at all levels of production, from spinning and weaving to designing and ready-to-wear manufacture.

In actual fact, there is no question of trying to outdo or compete with anyone at all, no creation centre having as yet thought of systematically launching and promoting sports fashions with the idea of making them universally accepted and valid for all. It is therefore a pioneering role that this Swiss group has created and intends to fulfil.

In the opinion of SFC, true elegance is to be found where beauty and utility merge. Utilitarian simplicity is essential wherever garments are intended to be worn in the open air and are expected to allow the freedom of movement required by active participation in sport. Such a requirement naturally precludes any search for originality at all costs and makes it essential to submit to certain very strict limitations in regard to conception cut and design. The first of the restrictions is dictated by the choice of materials, which must satisfy definite practical needs: simplicity of maintenance, freedom of movement and good thermal qualities in particular. Thus, the fabrics used for the fashions that concern us here must be considered more as technical fabrics than materials in which appearance, draping qualities and handle play the leading role. In the materials it chooses, sports and leisure fashion therefore occupies the position of an innovator at the head of the users of new materials. It is above all a question of creating a really functional fashion.

Thus, there is a very definite similarity of conception between the sports fashions conceived by SFC and modern architecture. A second similarity exists in the role attributed to decorative elements, which must detract neither from the shape nor from the function. It was this requirement that dictated SFC's choice of a « graphic » line for its 1963 and subsequent creations.

It is up to colour then to give life to the unavoidably somewhat severe architectural structure of the new sports and leisure styles, which successfully combine simplicity with elegance. Consequently colour is considered as a decisive element in sports and leisure fashion. This fashion's colours do not necessarily correspond to those of high fashion. But freedom, which would seem to be synonymous with the idea of leisure, does not mean that all colours can be used indiscriminately according to individual whim, which would create an unaesthetic kaleidoscopic anarchy and would complicate manufacture and marketing in the extreme. The colours therefore must change more or less every year, in order to stimulate production and sales, but at the same time be coordinated among themselves.

... to practice

These factors resulted in the four ranges or « chains » of colours dictated by SFC for the winter 1964/1965 and christened « sun » (from red to yellow including orange and mustard), « Havanna » (from beige to brown), « icy » (from green to a very cold light blue) and « granite » (from light grey to dark slate) — 20 different shades in all. The advantage of these « chains » of colour is that for the same model it is possible to use either different shades of the same « chain » or contrasting shades from different « chains ». In any case, the choice is wide enough to ensure that manufacturers never need to depart from the colours dictated (to which should be added both black and white), so that there is greater homogeneity throughout the collection.

If one was not at the showing and has not seen the collection of models and all relevant literature, it is obviously difficult to imagine the tremendous amount of work required to organize a collection of over 100 models of such remarkable unity combined with such variety, that is to say models all following — naturally to a greater or lesser degree — the general dictates laid down, in the 20 recognized colours, without any sort of deviation, and sometimes calling for close cooperation between four or five manufacturers, i. e. for instance, an elastic yarn maker, a wool weaver for the trouser fabric, a cotton weaver for the fabric used in the anorak, an embroiderer, a knitting manufacturer, a maker-up and sometimes even a dress-designer.

On the whole, it can be said that the practical achievements of members of the Swiss Fashion Club corresponded to the theoretical requirements laid down.

A great advance

This year's show undoubtedly constituted a big advance over 1963's. Last year, certain manufacturers seemed not to have completely understood the spirit that was supposed to animate the whole collection. There were still one or two waverers, a few false notes in regard to colours, while embroidery and jacquard tricot did not seem to have a proper grasp of their function.

This year, these weaknesses were remedied, resulting in greater unity, not only in colours but also in line, which is now unmistakably sporting and practical. The new requirements facing designers and the small scope left for frills led to the discovery of new and interesting solutions in various fields, more especially in the creation of fabrics and embroidery.

Generally speaking, all the models displayed are highly wearable, practical and comfortable. Preference is given to easy-care fabrics; and fabrics manufactured with « Helanca »® elastic yarns guarantee comfort to the wearer by being elastic in the length for the slacks and elastic in the width for the shoulders; certain fabrics are even made to stretch in both directions. The cut is generally extremely simple, the emphasis being laid on practical and comfortable qualities. Many disguised hoods, detachable linings held in place by means of zip-fasteners, fur or foam-back linings, much decorative stitching, pleats emphasizing the line but at the same time allowing ease of movement, no metal threads or shiny effects in the active sportswear and very little elsewhere.

In men's fashions, few belts but quite a few half-belts. The collection has been made richer by the admission of new members, from the hosiery and knitwear branch and the leather and fur clothing trade, representing a welcome addition to the club.

The actual showing

The organization of the Swiss Fashion Club show and the actual event deserve some attention. The show was held at Arosa, in the Grisons on January 15th last. The forty or so journalists and manufacturers present were all accommodated in one of the best hotels at an altitude of over 6200 feet, on the edge of the ski slopes (in excellent condition in spite of the small snowfall elsewhere this winter). In the morning, some fifteen ski instructresses modeled the main colours on the slopes, all dressed in the same outfits, each dyed in a different shade. In the afternoon a fashion parade was held, showing over 100 models, for both men and women: ski and afterski outfits, curling outfits, clothes for walks and travelling, garments for home and hotel wear, hostess gowns, etc. Almost all the models shown were original creations in the best of good taste... even those that we placed a near second will undoubtedly come first in the estimation of others. In brief, a collection of a standard that was all the higher — both as regards taste and workmanship — when it is considered that the field covered is so limited, a collection that does not risk causing a revolution at massproduction level (that is not its aim) but one that in the long run will influence sports fashions for the better, provided the work of members continues and develops.

The concentration in a single hotel of all those taking part favoured contacts between manufacturers and members of the press, while the perfect organization — even down to the smallest detail — simplified the work of journalists. Finally, let us add that a cloudless sky and almost spring-like sunshine contributed not a little to the success of this most enjoyable fashion event.
